SAVES CIRL FROM

Florence Dohoney, Reformed Habitue of the Tenderioin, Prevents Drunken Mother from Selling Child to Men.

REBUFFED BY PATROLMAN, AIDED BY SERGEANT.

Little Maria Kelly Was Dragged About Streets by Mother, the Two Sleeping Wherever Night Found Them.

The face was not a strange one to the Magistrate when Florence Dohoney appeared in Jefferson Market Court, but the hangers-on were surprised when she stepped forward as prosecutor instead of prosecuted. As "Sheenie Flossie" she was a well-know character in the Tenderloin until four months ago, but to-day she appeared to save a child from a fate like her own.

She had selzed little Maria Kelly from the hands of a drunken mother, who, it is alleged, tried to sell her to men of low character in a saloon for $25. The child was brought to court by the Society agents to tell her pitiful story. Her mother spent the night in the Tenderloin station on a charge of drunk-

Mrs. Kelly became addicted to the use of liquor years ago, and has steadily gone down the social scale. Six years ago her child was taken away from her and sent to the Dominican Sisters. She was happy there and the Sisters secured her a good home two weeks ago with Mrs. O'Donoghue, at No. 227 West One Hundred and Forty-second Contented in Home.

There, too, she was contented, for Mrs. O'Donoghue was kind to her and she was made to feel at home. She had almost forgotten the life of her babyhood when her mother heard she was out of the convent and went to Mrs. O'Donoghue's house to claim her. The woman had no legal papers to hold the child and let her go.

For a week they walked the streets, sleeping, the child says, wherever night found them. Although Mrs. Kelly gave the police an address the child says the street was their home, and that they

Flossie Dohoney delt there was something wrong when she saw the woman pulling the child into a saloon in Seventh avenue. She followed and says the woman, crazed with drink, was offering the child to a crowd of men for Flossie seized the child as a big man produced a roll of bills. When she started for the door the drunken woman lurched toward her. The man with the money struck at her, but she knew how to fight, and soon was outside with the seventh street station refused to listen to the story, and told Flossie to go to the Tenderloin station if she had any troubles to tell. The sergeant there was more attentive. While Flossie was explaining Mrs. Kelly came in, demanding the return of her child, "She's mine, and I'll sell her if I want to," she screamed. She was locked up. "Your face is familiar," said the day and told how she had rescued the pretty child. "Yes," she replied, "I have been here before, but I never will be again unless it be as now, when I come to try to save a child from a fate like

"I know all about the Tenderloin. There is nothing in it. I left it four months ago and am living an honest, decent life with my father. I'll never lose a chance to help the girls there or to keep young girls away from such

The child is anxious to go back to Mrs. O'Donoghue's and it is likely that the Society will send her there. Sergt. McCullagh, who first gave attention to Flossie Dohoney's complaint, will aid the little girl to find a home.

A CLOSE ESCAPE IN TENEMENT FIRE

Baby's Screams Awakened Father Who Wraps Bed Clothing About His Family and Fights Way to Street.

Samuel Breslauer, his wife and three small children, had a narrow escape from death in a fire which partially destroyed the tenement-house at No. 4 First street early to-day. Through fire and smoke they made their way up the steps from their rooms in the base ment, and none too soon. The fire started in a closet in their rooms, where it is thought mice had ignited matches. The flames spread along a partition against which rested the crib of Max, the baby of the fam-My. In ignorance of their danger the parents and two older children slept on until the heat awakened the baby. He screamed lustily, and the father awoke to find the room filled with smoke. He seized the baby in his arms and his wife took the next oldest child. The oldest boy clung to his mother's night started into the hall, but the man wrapped bed clothing around his wife and children and fought his way through. All reached the street in safety.

A policeman sent in an alarm and awakened the dozen families in the building. The fire was confined to the basement, where it almost destroyed Breslauer's roting and his small tailor.
